KRASNER WAS NEVER A PRISON ABOLITIONIST

When progressive District Attorney Larry Krasner was elected, he celebrated with his supporters and campaign team. Among his team were many self-styled prison abolitionists. As the politician and his entourage were reveling the night away, some supporters began shouting anti-police slogans. These chants were quickly shushed and discouraged from continuing. This suppression of anti-system sentiment seems to have been a sign of things to come with regards to Krasner’s position regarding the case of Mumia Abu Jamal.

It seems that Krasner is only willing to go so far. In a recent brief filled by Krasner’s office, it is made clear that using his position of power to facilitate freeing Mumia Abu Jamal was out of the question. Abu Jamal is convicted of murdering a Philadelphia police officer in 1981, and has been struggling to be released.

Some of Krasner’s supporters have framed his election as part of a “prison abolitionist” strategy, but his actions seemed to have left them disappointed. Krasner complained that rejecting Abu Jamal’s appeal is “unnecessary” and “affects many other cases.” Despite handing Abu Jamal’s defense six boxes of evidence that were not made available during the initial trials, the DA refused to let the appeal be filed.

In many ways Krasner is correct to state that the appeal can affect other cases. If one person who is not only accused but

CHECKING IN ON AMAZON

We live in an increasingly monitored society, whose authorities seek to increase control over the populace and prevent any semblance of authentic freedom. Even if Amazon was presented from establishing its secondary headquarters here in Philadelphia, it continues to be at the forefront of those imposing those monitors on us. Their AWS cloud computing services are involved in everything from agriculture to intelligence agencies, their order and delivery services have changed the very landscape around us, and their Ring brand doorbells (and other devices) have become increasingly threatening to any sense of privacy.

The news that Amazon decided against establishing its HQ2 in Queens, NY, due to resistance from unions and the community, was widely celebrated by anarchists and the left. Such a development suggests that the informal campaign against Amazon last year in Philadelphia that seemed to result in vandalism, theft of various Amazon products (including the Ring doorbells), sabotage of Amazon lockers, and even the arson of a truck belonging to Amazon, was influential in preventing Amazon from picking Philadelphia for the same purpose. But that doesn’t mean their influence has not continued to grow here and elsewhere.

For some time, there has been an increasing number of Amazon warehouses around city centers, with Philly as no exception. Their proliferation of distribution centers and loc

WHAT WENT DOWN

January 3 - Philly cop hit by car while on motorcycle sustains severe head injury. Motorist says they did not see him.

January 9 - Young adult wanted in Wilmington for felony probation violations flees police, leading them to crash on I-95 near the Philadelphia Airport, and escapes to South Philly. Two of the five cops injured in the chase were hospitalized after their car flipped. The young person previously escaped custody on a different occasion by kicking out the rear window of a vehicle he was held in.

January 14 - Second trial group of Vaughn 17 prison rebels begins in Wilmington, DE. Kevin Berry, Abednego Baynes, John Bramblel, and Obadiah Miller are charged with assaulting officers, one of whom died, in the course of the takeover of C-Building at James T. Vaughn Correction Center in Feb. 2017.

January 15 - A small riot breaks out in Suburban Station as SEPTA police force out the homeless in 26 degree weather. Officers are assaulted and a door’s glass is broken. Police used batons and pepper spray to subdue the crowd.

Late January - Bus stop advertisements targeted by anarchist and anti-civilization graffiti.

February 18 - Second Vaughn 17 trial’s jury delivers no convictions on all four defendants.

Late February - A large bit of graffiti seen in Rittenhouse, nearly as wide as the building is long on which it appeared, which reads: “Act For Freedom (A) Destroy Borders (J)”

February 20 - Flash demonstration against ICE, nations, and borders manifests in the streets outside the ICE offices on 8th Street in Chinatown before 9am.

February 21 - An activist is arrested during the Black and Brown Workers Cooperative’s disruption of a City Council meeting, protesting councilmanic prerogative and council people like Jannie Blackwell for their role in gentrifying the neighborhoods they represent.

POLICING UPDATE

In nearby Wilmington, DE, police officer Thomas Oliver Jr. is facing charges for raping a woman in his patrol car while on duty in October of last year. Oliver coerced the woman, telling her that he would arrest her for a warrant if she did not have sex with him.

In the opposite direction, in Camden, NJ, Camden County police killed a 17-year-old girl on February 13th. An officer driving a police cruiser struck the girl around 10PM in East Camden, killing her. The police have not released information about the officer at the time of this writing.

Philadelphia police have been causing their share of distress as well. On February 10th, two cops crashed into and injured a motorist in Kensington. The motorist is in the hospital in unknown condition. A video dated February 6th has been going viral on social media. The video shows a police officer grabbing a handcuffed woman by the hair, kicking her legs out, and knocking her to the ground. Former PPD homicide detective Philip Nordo was arrested for raping and intimidating witnesses as well as sending them money to keep quiet during his 20-year career as a cop. The revelation of his predatory and coercive behavior has thrown many cases he was involved in into question. Unsurprisingly, witnesses’ complaints about the assaults did not lead to anything while Nordo was still a police officer. Nordo was eventually fired in 2017, but only after a defense attorney found that he had been improperly placing money in an imprisoned witness’s account.

SEPTA police have shown a particular cruelty lately toward the homeless and disabled in two recent incidents at Suburban Station. On January 15th, a small riot erupted as SEPTA police were forcing homeless people out of the station during sub-zero weather. Officers were attacked, and used pepper spray and batons against the homeless. In a different incident, a SEPTA policeman can be seen in a facebook video insulting and dragging around a disabled man in a wheelchair on February 12th. The nurse who took the video confronts the officer, asking him why he is treating the man poorly, only to be insulted by the police officer and told to leave the station.

armed repression and open assassinations. The citizenry is outraged, and the more it is outraged the more innocent they feel...

Those small foci of insurgency in an unequal way FACE capitalist violence, but the citizenry is outraged and the more they get angry, the more they feel they are voting for those who offer them the so-called “social peace.” I wonder, if we are unable to organize our anger, with what face will we tell our loved ones to fight for their ideas?

I will not live as the law tells me. I will advance on that path that other unruly people have already covered... that of action! Together with my comrades, together with my loved ones and those who give themselves faithfully and constant to the fight against the prevailing ideology, because I will not live in the shadows of resignation and indifference, I will experience the intensity of a life fully lived... authentic and free life... life without restrictions. I will boldly defend the possibility of developing myself without obeying.

I consider it essential that every individual that has not yet been subjugated by power manifests their anger by advancing along the path of action, that they come together, realizing with their peers a intensification of conflict, an intensification of action! To act autonomously without waiting for conditions, steps, or processes.

Let’s give life to something, something that inflames and destroys everything that is at the service of power and its bourgeois pretensions that it has removed the dominant face with all our rage, seeking continuity, that the roar of chaos destroys the émieux of all the powerful... we break his laws and we put an end to centuries of silence!!!

WE ATTACK AND DESTROY THOSE RESPONSIBLE FOR REPRESSION AND EXPLOITATION!!! WE ATTACK AND DESTROY YOUR JAILS, POLICE STATIONS AND COURTS!!!

Let’s not waste time discussing how and when to act; every moment is propitious; we are enemies of the order and we light up with flames of hate the miserable bourgeois streets... so that our actions manage to destabilize their “social peace,” their tranquility, their interests.

My fraternal greetings to prisoners of war all over the world, I know that behind the situation of each one, a thorny and indomitable heart is beating.

To the comrades of the Conspiracy of the Cells of Fire and Revolutionary Struggle, kidnapped in the jails of Korydallos, Greece. To Marcelo Villarreal, Juan Aliete and Joaquin Garcia, kidnapped in different sections of the high security prison, Alejandro Centeno, captive in the former penitentiary. To the compañero Tamara So, captive in the prison of Valdivia.

Explosive attack on a Ford car showroom by the ELF (Mexico) via 325

Communique received on 02/01/2019: It’s obvious that technico-industrial progress is advancing and with it the impact on nature is becoming stronger and more irreversible...

We won’t take a reformist and conformist attitude in the face of this situation, now less than ever as the ‘ecologist’ struggle has been absorbed by governmental institutions and platform groups, which prepared the ground for a new form of irrational consumerism, depicted as ‘ecological’, ‘green’... (sic) so as to allow companies to make profits at the cost of the destruction of the planet and all the beings which resist it... as hypocritical happiness and tranquility dominated the end of the year festivities, we preferred to prepare and carry out an attack with an explosive device. This event occurred on 1st January, against a Ford Gimsa car showroom situated in Mexico-Texcoco Carretera in Reyes a la Paz, which caused damage to the facade and to some cars that were parked there... with this action we express solidarity with the comrades on the run in this territory under surveillance and with the Argentine comrades who are subjected to a wave of repression. Following this explosion, this attack is also part of a coordination of actions in several areas of the country and responds to a call for agitation and attack.

01.12.18: In response to the call for agitation against the G20 we placed an explosive device outside the building of the 15th Legislature of the State of Quintana Roo-located in Cancun to demonstrate that solidarity is not just a paraphrase of slogans. With this attack we also join the action initiated by the campes in Argentina who have become a product of the media spectacle that they want to accustom us to, to know that their disgusting tourist paradise will not prevent us from throwing ourselves into action.

Attack Cells Against the devastation of the Earth
The keynote speaker was Antol Dolgoff, the son of two lifelong anarchists from this era. Sam and Esther Dolgoff were active in publications and organizations such as the IWW, the Free Society Group, the Sartre Society, the Libertarian League, Freybee Arbittertime, and the Libertarian Book Club. His talk was titled “Disobedient Jews,” which uncovered historical characters, immures, and their significances in the anarchist movement. Dolgoff spoke from memory of his childhood and concluded that he was neither a historian nor an academic.

Dolgoff shared a story about a Russian Jew, Abraham Robbinowitz, a college-educated man who left NYC to support the IWW on the opposite side of the country. Dolgoff said he felt a relation between himself and Robbinowitz, though he had never met. Dolgoff shared how Robbinowitz was killed by police during the massacre of Everett in 1916. The IWW reported:

"He was one who was without a flag, a race oppressed by the intolerance and superstition of the ages, and died fighting for the brotherhood of man."

Notes on remembrance for today's movements:

There are a few points to share as we relate to modern social movements and how I see them in relation to the Philadelphia’s far left and post-left scenes.

1. For or against the state: anarchism, communism, socialism

It seems that similarities have brought these political frameworks closer together. However, in today’s society, as the grudge of capitalism continues to become more desperate to maintain state and corporate power under Trump’s presidency and the rising economic/labor precarity, it remains a fact that those who are outside of an archaenic-communist, we cannot forget what happens when communists get state power. Recalled during this conference was how the Bolivians and other communist state agents enslaved anarchists.

This is a piece of history that was detrimental to many Yiddish-speaking anarchists and to Yiddish culture. Fanny Barron was one named Russian anarchist who was killed in 1921 by knights of the communist state after being imprisoned without charges along with hundreds of others, according to one speaker, some early unsolved murders of US anarchists were rumored to be committed by communists rather than state agents.

Remember that the next time a comrade jokes about sending anarchists to gulg.

2. Revitalization of the Philly IWW Local

The Philadelphia IWW Local 8 was brought up as one of the most ethnically diverse and aggressive chapters in the country since 1900. Many of the Yiddish-speaking immigrant anarchists were active in labor organizing and the IWW was brought up by nearly every panelist. The rebirth of this organization in the last two years has been supported, as that was a step towards becoming a widespread radical organizing project.

3. Actions and Jewish heritage

During the Q&A section, someone brought up the importance of “flagging” or being visibly of Jewish heritage. An example was given by someone with both Ashkenazi and English text. I liked this example because it doesn’t imply religion in the same way that other signifiers of Judaic descent might. Revealing one’s Jewish heritage in the streets can shift the narrative of who we are fighting for and why.

Often, Jews hold the collective memory of surviving ghettos, imagines, and their significances in the anarchist movement. Stories and intergenerational trauma can inspire children of the Jewish diaspora to fight back rather than be complete in white supremacy and assimilation.

An act of solidarity in an action can be meaningful in an era of border walls and Muslim ban, as our ancestors were also scapegoated, banned, and turned away at the border while seeking asylum. Intentionality about what space we do take up as white and white-passing people (in the case of Ashkenazi Jews) in a society that is founded/formed as black and brown bodies is important. We should approach our common enemy with intersectionality and solidarity as our sharpest weapons.

This conference was the first of its kind. It was welcomed with a significant reception of interest and attendance. As a person who is both a lifelong anarchist and a descendant of Yiddish-speaking Russian Jews who escaped for Poland for Poland and then to the US in the 1910s, this conference felt personally validating. I hope these themes can be further built upon as Jewish and decentcommunication search for an identity and space to reject state supremacy, capitalism, or supportive of a liberal ethnostate. As atheistic anarchists, I hope this revitalized history can assist in redressing our political influences, affiliations, and strategies against oppression on new terrain.

Unfortunately, state zionism has disgraced much of what our radical traditions have stood for. We cannot let the radical tradition of our heritage be ignored or suppressed, as it is valuable for those who are looking to find themselves in a place other than lukewarm left zionists. This is obviously a larger conversation on identity and strategy that I hope to see folks continue to explore, so that we can sharpen our methods of attacking state repression, police violence and the exploitation of life under capitalist regime.

Neither God nor Master

A Northeast Philadelphia priest named Reverend Steven J. Marinucci was placed on administrative leave in late January, following an allegation of sexual abuse, according to a statement by the Archdiocese of Philadelphia.

Three weeks earlier, the Philadelphia Archdiocese announced that two area priests had been found "not suitable for ministry" following an investigation by church officials of sexual-abuse allegations against them in the early 1980s. The Rev. John F. Meyers had most recently served as interim rector at Malvern Retreat House. The Rev. Raymond W. Smartt is retired and has been on leave because of failing health since 1995.

Another local priest, Msgr. Joseph L. Logrip had been placed on administrative leave after a sexual-abuse allegation was made against him for conduct in the early 1980s, the archdiocese also announced at the time. Logrip earlier had been cleared of similar allegations that surfaced after a 2011 grand jury report.

Former Montgomery County pastor Jerry Zweigl was charged in the beginning of January with 200 counts of possessing child pornography as well as multiple counts of indecent assault.

In August, Roman Catholic leaders in Pennsylvania were revealed to have covered up decades of child sex abuse involving more than 1,000 victims and hundreds of priests, in a new grand jury report.

Meanwhile, Pope Francis publicly admitted this month that priests have used such as "sexual slaves" - and are probably still doing so - while the church continues to contend with a wave of cases involving pedophile priests in countries worldwide, from Ireland and the United States to Australia.

The wanton malfeasance of the Catholic Church proliferates like a plague, even in this period of relative unpopularity.

We are still living in a largely secular society - but modernities still exist, furthering genocide and/or subjugation to a world of industrialism and forced labor. A strict Judeo-christian morality is still imposed by that larger society. Even the radical Christians speak positively of following Jesus, implying that leadership and worship of an overlord are still worthwhile. Hell, even mutual aid initiatives by anarchists are assumed to be Christian charity from the outset by every beneficiary polled, if they’re not told otherwise.

The use of this paper has created cautionary on many an occasion, and perhaps serves as a basis for the anti-religious position that is to follow. The word "anarchism" - originally chosen for its use in a narrative portion of Bonanno’s "American Jihad" that is proactive in the lives of the reformist reaction to anarchist acts, among other reasons - happily finds its linguistic origin in 16th century ecclesiastical Latin for "an ashamed thing" or "an excommunicated person," and, later, a "thing devoted to evil." Many an anarchist newspaper at the turn of the 20th century found common cause with this sentiment, using terms like "Light Bearer" (another name for Lucifer) as their titles as well as symbols like torches to convey the same. Some of this carried with it an active sense of the otherness of the way in which it has been white supremacy and colonization all over the world. Churches have consistently inhibited freedom wherever they are, and have played a crucial role in normalizing authoritarian social and political roles on this continent.

In this light, the New Sanctuary Movement here and liberation theology everywhere else is no more than attempts to reform institutional religion and make it more reflective of the source of the problems they fight (i.e., the state). We may find accomplices for criminal acts of resistance that in those religious movements that, again, departurizes the crumbling of their edifices — but we should also remember that these structures only become the gathering places they are today by erasing the commons in which people previously gathered in, through dominionism's ritual capitalization. That erasure made it more difficult to survive without turning to the church's (or some other) authority. In fact, relying on churches to house people outside of the law further disempowers all but the institution — look to the refugee squats of Greece for inspi- ration if you care for an empowering humanitarian alternative.

Religion might not directly impact quite as many people as digital and digital gratification in the digital age, but neither is the Catholic Church some low-hanging fruit with which an absolute conflict would be disadvantageous. It has the largest denomi- nation of any church in this country — more than 68 million adherents, according to 2012 review.

Add to the Catholic Church's abuses the database of more than 19 million sexual abuse cases that detailed the paths of 790 victims in the Southern Baptist Church. The database was recently compiled after decades of leaders refusing demands to create such a list themselves, and actively keeping such details about their leaders hidden from the public. While the Catholic Church is the largest, the Southern Baptist Church is the second largest faith group after the Catholic Church, and has over 200 churches in the Philadelphia area, so there really is no shortage of targets. Meanwhile, the overly oppressive Mormon Church has opened a new location in the middle of Philadelphia in order to further propagate its mes- sage.

Above all, religion exists as an attack on passion and there- fore an attack upon life. The morality it imposes is a governance that requires its adherents to actively repress their passions (as some odd act of devotion to a god that granted them free will). Because they (or when they fail to) repress their urge, religion's devotees can become monstrous — that is, their repressed urges are most often taken out on others as they have power over so that they may still contain or control the narrative. Both the Church and the state have failed to address this particular plague, and any further attempts would be nothing more than a reform of the very institution that remains the problem.

"From time to time they exchanged remarks on other subjects, and cast a flirtant glance at the dying man. The rattle in his throat grew more and more painful. At last, with a trembling hand, he pointed towards a lump on the throat and asked, 'Is it? It is not; it is only a vein of the jugular, siphoned off; it is not the heart'; and the man laid his hand upon its side, and felt its pulsation. 'I am not sick,' he said. 'I was not weighing upon him, suffocating him. It was taken off. Ten minutes afterwards, he died.' — Dostoevsky ★

REPORTBACK: YIDDISH ANARCHISM, NEW SCHOLARSHIP ON A FORGOTTEN TRADITION

The Yiddish Anarchist conference took place on J20 at the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research. The Yivo has been an important site for Yiddish studies for over a century, looking here from Poland. Most of its staff was killed at that time, but smuggling operation allowed it to be one of the only organiz- ations of its kind to escape and endure.

The event pamphlet read, "Yiddish-speaking Jewish anarchists were one of the pillars of the U.S. anarchist movement before World War Two. This largely immigrant radical milieu was cen- tered in NYC and opposed capitalism, the state, and organized religion. Yiddish-speaking anarchists built militant unions, anarchist newspapers and organizations to fight their cause. Many famous anarchists were linked to this movement, including Johann Most, Emma Goldman, Alexander Berkman, and Rudolf Rocker. Yiddish-speaking anarchists played a piv- otal role in unions like the International Ladies’ Garment Work- ers’ Union (ILGWU), while the Yiddish anarchist newspaper the Hayter was the largest and longest lasting U.S. anarchist publication and formed a significant part of the Yiddish cultural landscape.”

Panels recalled people, organizations and roles that anar- chists had during the late 1800s and early 1900s. Relaying that Yiddish-speaking immigrant anarchists (along with Italian, Russian, Spanish and German) earned the tradition of anar- chism into the 20th century. The event had three sections:

2. "Against Star and Commissar: Russian Revolutions and Yid- dish Anarchism.”
3. "Language, Identity, and Culture: Transformations of Yid- dish Anarchism.”

On the first panel, Kenyon Zimmer (author of Immigrants Against the State: Yiddish and Italian Anarchism in America) described how Yiddish speaking communities found each other. Another speaker, Alee B. Bonin (an independent scholar) addressed a preeminent role that a part of their community, as many were anti-religious. Instead, the community was bound through language, culture, and a com- mon enemy in antisemitism.

Affluence through a common enemy in antisemitism (and oppres- sion) was a radical idea in the 20s and 30s. The section included in Yiddish-speaking people, particularly apparent in the wave of Antifa. Corrupted with the perception that Yiddish speaking immigrants were a "stateless and flagless people," the ideological foundation was already congruent with the wave of antisemitism. Emma Goldman's writing of A Woman Without a Country was a shared senti- ment, at least in title, as the Jewish diaspora continued.

Tom Gogins (Storm in My Heart: Memories from the Widow of Johann Most [AK Press]) presented on NYC’s German and Yiddish workers movement through the 19th century. In this group, he talked about the anti-Semitic nature of the group and how a former prosecutor and judge assigned to this case have worked on together, almost everyone who was indicted folded on each

Immigrant anarchists became more persecuted and turned to organized labor. For an extended period of time, this was a major organizing group in the Yiddish-speaking movement. The New York Criminal Anarchy Act of 1902. Later, the 1917 Immigration Act would again explicitly ban anarchists from US entry. The Yivo was hosting an exhibit titled "The Door Slams Shut," which displayed political cartoons about the hatred and American reaction against immigrants to the US, "100 years later, the players have changed. But the issues have re- mained remarkably similar.”

There were over 20 Yiddish-language anarchist papers during this time, including Vos Vils Di Anarchism (What Anarch- ists want?), Di Praye Gezehschaft (Free Society), Di Anarkhie (The Anarchy, some of whose members, including Avrom Grosman and Boris Engelage, were executed by the Russian revolutionaries), Anarcho- (Anarchist; published in Philadelphia by "the Group of Anarchist-Communists"), and Praye Arbhte Shrin (Free Voice of Labor).

It was unmentioned on the panel, but Philadelphia had a signif- icant influx of Yiddish speaking Jews from Russia during that period. This explains why at least one Yiddish-language anar- chist newspapers was based here. Vortaline de Cleyre was said to have taught English to the Yiddish-speaking anarchists in Philadelphia, while they taught her Yiddish. Emma Goldman had spent significant time here as well. Like those who immi- grated to NYC, many had escaped pogroms and persecution to establish Yiddish-speaking communities in North and South Philly.

While introducing Forty Years in the Struggle: The Memoirs of a Jewish Anarchist, Robert F. Heims mentions that Mount Sinai hospital (which was located at 41 and Reed, until it was recently demolished as capitalists gentrify the neighborhood with million-dollar homes) was a group of anarchist and socialist physicians in 1905. Its purpose was to serve the local Jewish factory workers in need of free or cheap healthcare. Another book, Anarchist in the American Movement: A Political Autobiography and Personal Reminiscences by Joseph Cohen was published in Philadelphia by the Radical Library (Work- man’s Circle Bench 272) in 1945. The chapter, "My First Years in Philadelphia" sheds light on the Yiddish-speaking radicals who formed cooperative businesses near South street in the early 1900s. It is the only news book about the Yiddish-speaking mother lived on Marshall Street in North Philly at this time. It’s called Voices from Marshall Street: Jewish Life in a Philadel- phia Neighborhood 1920-1960. Though not anarchist in focus, the book is about the Yiddish-speaking legacy as characters in the community that these immigrants formed.

Mark Greenberg discussed the major role that Jewish anarchists played in leading a Yiddish-speaking anarchist movement to the US. The Union of Russian Workers was one anarchist feder- ation of several thousand members organized primarily by Jews of eastern European origin. Yiddish the language and the YW and other unions, helped lead a national strike movement in 1910. Many anarchist Russian immigrants had participated in the revolutions of 1905 and 1917, respectively.
a more recent influence by materialist analysis of political economy that makes its sophisticated understanding of the present moment and its uncompromising conclusions about how anarchists should approach it — possible. This is more than can be said for most U.S. anarchists today, who seem more and more into posting about their favorite politics on social media than actually doing away with government.

Gelderloos understands the economy as a global system in constant need of exponential expansion into new markets, a need that frequently creates a state of crisis until capitalism figures out how to restructure itself, and whose present crisis is uniquely significant for anarchism to have somehow new and adequately huge enough to go next. One of Gelderloos’s essays’s strengths is its ability to articulate the insight that 1) we are currently witnessing an unprecedented level of global uncertainty; 2) given capitalism’s history, we can assume that capital is currently trying to restructure itself in some new fashion in order to avoid collapse; and 3) there is therefore a real need for us to intervene against this movement — in ways that hurt, rather than help, whatever path capitalism may end up taking towards its recovery.

To this end, Gelderloos’s analysis dissolves the notion of a fast-approaching fascist future that has dominated the radical and liberal imagination alike in the U.S. since President Trump’s election. This part is really worth reading and is where Gelderloos’s historical approach is strongest. Democracy, especially in a settler state like the U.S., has always been more effective as fascism in furthering white supremacy and capitalist accumulation. In other words, notes, has been essential for recuperating dissent and institutionalizing political change. Those who warn of the dangers of falling into fascism, which would involve consolidating the government into a one-party system, “implicitly identify the victory of the second party, the Democrats, as banishing the threat, a victory for anti-fascism. That lays the groundwork for a democratic renewal.”

Capitlism and democracy are presently struggling with a very real crisis of legitimacy, which anarchists can either encourage by spreading and modeling our own ideas for what else is possible, or can help defy by mobilizing fear of Trump’s authoritarianism into electoral participation and leftist organizing. Time and time again, Gelderloos shows, radical social movements that have been emasculated by the lito-economistic order have been deprived of power through a particular set of tactics, including participation in the system that leads to a renewal of the state’s legitimacy. As Gelderloos writes, “We have been defeated by the same model so many times, we should get an outline of it tattooed on our foreheads so we see it whenever we look in the mirror.”

At a group discussion of the piece at the A-Space in January, we collectively puzzled over one particular line, in the short section entitled “And the Anarchists?” that ends the essay: “That skill that they should be falling out of is the capacity to turn survival into a communal concern.” Many anarchists secretly still like being told what to do, especially when confronted with the reality that this essay describes, and we would like had more detail about what this skill would look like.

Here in Philly, survival projects tend to be so detached from antagonism that they rag tag efforts. In fact, they are usually pitted against each other — that most anarchists have chosen to concentrate on one or the other. Creating surviv- al networks for ourselves and other insurgents, with which we can move towards self-sufficiency while we attempt to destroy the status quo, is an ambitious project, but still one worth considering.

Peter Gelderloos is writing from Spain. This is important to note because, although anarchists have failed all over the world, it is probably easier to still imagine a transformative future if we were already witnessing anarchist intervention from the vantage point of Catalonia. Despite the current state of repression and pacification that Gelderloos has written about elsewhere, anti-authoritarianism has been ingrained in the rural and therefore an urgent need for us to intervene against this movement — in ways that hurt, rather than help, whatever path capitalism may end up taking towards its recovery.

In Philadelphia, at least among those of us who attended this discussion of the future at the A-Space, capitalism and the state’s recovery from crisis seems like much less of a sure thing. This essay and a number of other essays, tend to doubt that capitalism will be able to quickly restructure itself in such a way that staves off the ecological collapse that is rapidly accelerating all around us. Will the politico-economi- c system pull itself together and become an eco-engineered, democratic socialist, totally managed helcape? Or will we have to bug out with our gun collection to compete for the last remaining fresh water within the next 20 years? Either way, we will not be voting for Bernie in 2020.

“I have not spoken of anarchists in the preceding consider- ations because we are losing our ability to manifest as a social force in the changing circumstances. We have not suc- cessful social movement techniques to combat the methods by which the various additions capitalism instills in us, abandoning the puritan habits that pass for politics, spreading revolu- tionary imaginaries, or communalizing daily life. Our abil- ity to riot was enough to change the social discourse and open a few new possibilities for social movements over the last two decades. If the system does not repair itself quickly, however, our combative skills may become insufficient and invisible bite the far greater conflicts that will emerge. The skill that may be most important, and that seems to be most lacking, is the capacity to turn survival into a commu- nal concern.” — Peter Gelderloos other and took places. In this case, defendants stood by their principles and called the prosecution’s bluff.

In the previous trial, the prosecution succeeded in gaining public sympathy for their men because the defendants only knew those two — Jarreau Ayers and Dwayyne Staat — attested to their participation in the takeover. Staats testified that he had sought to plan the uprising with six fellow “fighters” — in- mates who would have nothing to lose. According to Staats, the plan was for two prisoners to subdue each of the three correctional officers, while he took care of the prison coun- selor. Daring that same trial, Ayers testified that he had not been told about the plan in advance, but that he’d stepped up to help out just in case it was in motion. Ayers helped with the hos- tage negotiations and checked on prisoners who had medical issues. Both Ayers and Staats risked additional repression by returning to the stand during the second trial to exonerate the defendants, as well as expand on their prior accounts of what happened.

In the second trial, yet with only contradictory, patchy testi- mony and one questionable DNA sample, the prosecution was unable to convince the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that any of the defendants were involved in the uprising. The jury returned not guilty verdicts on 35 of the 40 counts against the four defendants, and returned “no decision” verdicts on the remaining five counts. These included riot and murder of a law enforcement officer for Obadiah Miller, and riot and assault of an officer for John Bramble. Ab bigedro Baynes and Kevin Berry were cleared of all charges.

Many of the defendants’ supporters have highlighted the de- fendants’ innocence and the oppression they’re endured as reasons they deserve support, despite the “tragedy” of some- one’s death in the course of the uprising. We do not think it’s true that a law enforcement officer died. We respect the im- mense courage and commitment it must have taken for any prisoner to participate in the takeover and risk their lives for freedom. Correctional officers keep prisoners captive and stand in the way of their freedom — that is their job. Moving towards liberation means preparing yourself to fight those who insist on standing in your way.

The fact that some people were prepared to fight and went through with it should inspire the rest of us to be more real about what liberation will take. The Vaughn prison takeover is one of the most important insurrections in the past two decades, in an era in which the extreme risks of repression have de- terred more and more people from rebellion.

“Police, I speak of all this because this is what I see going on. How many real and good dudes do you know that got locked up because a rat decided to do the white man’s job for him? We are putting each other in here — and we keep killing each other — for what? For all the time they’re reading these rat campuses appre- ciating each other to appease the white man. These plantations wouldn’t be so full of us if we stopped putting each other here, and put the police to do their job themselves without any help. Think: would you be here if it wasn’t for a rat? No, right? A lot of good dudes wouldn’t.”

WHO DO YOU PROTECT?

The story here actually starts more than two years ago, just days before the last presidential election. What the story recalls is something pretty basic about the relationship be- tween that epoch and what we’ve forgotten about it in mobilizations against fascist demors. Sometimes it takes a few years for a tendency to emerge, for (good and bad) hab- its to form, and problems to become clear. I will address a recurring problem that has been crystallizing: sometimes we lose sight of the cops right in front of us, while chasing after fascists in the distance.

A chant can sometimes be a warning sign. Chants at dem- os are usually ambiguous or forgettable, but once in while they stick out. At the antifascist demonstration against the National Socialist Movement (NSM) rally in Harrisburg, in November 2016, people began chanting at the police: “Who do you serve? Who do you protect?” The chant was new and bizarre to me, but obviously habitual to the demonstrators chanting it. Like many chants (for example, “no justice, no peace”), it can be interpreted two different ways: an appeal to some liberal norm or a provocation. For this chant, it de- pends on you if you ask the question in earnest or rhetorically/ satirically. It also depends on who listens to the chant: is this an attempt at dialogue with the cops? In this case, the intention was as confused as the organizing, which had hun- dreds of anarchists milling around as fascists made speech- es for hours, the two groups separated by a line of riot police.

It was a sunny day in November, but at least some people re- alized nice weather was no excuse to stand around, acting as unwitting substitutes for the fascists’ missing audience. For one blissful moment, cans of soda rained down on the police. But then, someone in the crowd threw their body in between the police and the soda cans. "What the hell are you doing here for the fascists?" It was as if a manifestation of the chant had been accidentally conjured by the crowd, a fully personified librettist, achieving their goals with the cops and reminding every one of their duty to protect us.

Flash forward two years later and this confusion persists. It’s not necessarily that people are confused about the police (tout le monde déteste la police, non?), it would be difficult to believe that suddenly everyone adopted liberal attitudes. It’s true that many new street fighting tactics were introduced, and their effectiveness is still debated in the media.

We do not ask the cops who do they protect; we do not talk to the police at all. If you hear a complain ask “who do you protect?”, act like you know better than to talk to the police and answer the question for them. Remind them that we are facing both the cops and the fascists in the streets. Who do you protect? The answer is always never.

also convicted of murdering a police officer is able to use the courts to leave prison, certainly others will find ways to do the same. Regardless of whether Abu Hamid is innocent or guilty in the eyes of the law, those who purport to want the abolition of prisons and/or policing can easily understand that setting a precedent of leniency around crimes that disrupt and threaten functioning of prisons (escape, contraband, parole violations, assault on guards or officers, etc) would be a benefit. Krasner never thought of the Order of Police also understands that if they understood that it would undermine the system that supports them.

Certainly Krasner has taken action to clear house and reform the justice system, but, as he has said, his office’s top priority remains justice, not abolition or liberation. Krasner is in a position of power to do something about the police, to interrupt policing and imprisonment in Philadelphia. Krasner could indiscreetly dismiss cases, defund services that aid police, and decriminalize as many crimes as possible until he gets charged with misconduct. Krasner could trash his office, fire his entire staff, and leave the city. Krasner could call meeting after meeting with top police and prison officials and never show up.

Those who want to be rid of prisons or policing should not be surprised by police reform is not anti-state reform. Relying on a lackey of justice to abolish the backbone of the justice system is a stretch. Even more so when he has billed himself as a progressive and reformist, not an abolitionist.

ers has now resulted in some combination of the two at 23rd and South Streets. Amazon tractor trailers litter the highways, smaller delivery vehicles scurry about the city, their "green" image has been disfigured, accentuated, and their increasing employees plod through the grocery aisles, face in phone, shopping for and delivering to those too wealthy to bother with Amazon’s own delivery force. Amazon — Amazon itself owns. And now their popular Ring brand vidvideo doorbells are being equipped with facial recognition soft-networking and providing information directly to the police.

Philly-based anti-capitalist art collective "amazon crime" sums up a report from The Intercept as such:

"Amazon’s list of technologies marketed to police and ICE includes their doorbell camera company, Ring. Law enforcement, including Philadelphia’s PD, have partnered with Amazon’s Ring to have access to their data. Philip’s Sergeant John Mastin thanked Ring for being a "supportive partner in the fight against crime."

In November, Amazon submitted a patent application to combine Ring with facial recognition technology so it scans anyone walking by a home in real-time, cross-references facial images with a database of “suspicious” people compiled by local police and home owners, and feeds that information to police.

While developments in facial recognition are quickly advancing, there are usually quite a lot of circumstances that must line up for it to fully function. Recent reports that crime prosecution rates remain low (e.g. only around 25% of armed robberies in Philly) credit, in part, citizens not participating in the identification of suspects that are photographed or video taped. Still, the full Intercept report does mention that the Ring collaboration with police has already contributed to an arrest here in Philadelphia.

Of course, Amazon is not alone in these endeavors either. It is no secret that Facebook has long been using and im-powering on facial recognition software, in addition to its exhaustive transgressions of user privacy, but new reports that Twitter has been storing “deleted” messages further confirms what we already suspect of these platforms. It has also been suggested that the viral “ten year challenge”, which encouraged participants to post old and new photos of themselves side-by-side on the social media platform of their choice, was actually a perfect tool for improving such software. Google recently revealed that they had hidden a built-in mic in its Nest Secure device, reminiscent of Amazon’s Alexa device. The US government is not alone in this — often stories that existence of smart phones has outfitted much of the populace with a portable wire-tap, complete with tracking software and camera. And speaking again of cameras, the Philade-phia Parking Authority has begun to mount cameras on its vehicles, much like the police department has, but these are positioned to record license plates of cars they pass, regardless of the angle the car is parked at. This is in addition to the gross proliferation of cameras on street corners, businesses, and homes, which already have the potential to share re-

REVIEW: GELDERLOOS’ “DIAGNOSTIC OF THE FUTURE”

“Diagnostic of the Future,” published by Crimethinc in the fall of 2018, is Peter Gelderloos’ latest extensive piece of writing. A lot has changed since How Nonviolence Protects the State, the 2006 historical analysis of social struggles that made Gelderloos a significant anarchist author and persuad-incredible young middle-class Americans that breaking through a window is a great idea all the time. This time, Gelderloos projects his analysis into the future in an ambitious attempt to predict how capitalism and the state might restructuring their way out of their present crisis, and what this implies for anarchist intervention in this moment.

“Diagnostic of the Future” will disappoint some because the essay doesn’t actually deliver the conclusive diagnosis it sets us up to expect. It does tell us what to do about what may or may not happen in the future. But predicting the future is not the reality’s goal, nor is it predictions what’s significant about this piece of writing.

Much of Gelderloos’ analytic strength across his writings lies in reintroducing a long-term historical perspective into which the present is understood as an augmented and ampuand the radical milieu of the moment." Diagnostic shows
